by the common bond of national consciousness, modern economic and cultural differentiation has gone far to destroy it. Jews stand divided in separate camps, and fight each other with a bitterness previously unknown in Jewry except in religious matters.

The progressive decay of the Jewish ethnic unity is most evident in the changes which have supervened in respect of language, education mixed marriages, and baptism. In the following chapters this process of assimilation will be traced in its various phases.